

A volunteer during the Mexican war, Franklin Pierce rose to the rank of brigadier general. As President he initiated a program of western development and obtained congressional support for the construction of a railroad connecting the West with the South.