

President Thomas Jefferson, a genius of his time, could plot an eclipse, break a horse, survey a field, play the violin and was an excellent writer. During his administration, the government was run so economically that the large surplus in the Treasury resulted in the abolishment of all internal taxes.